

Ugh. Your head. What happened?

Let's think hard about this. The last thing you remember... is kind of fuzzy. A project team meeting, possibly. Lots of bespectacled nerds sitting around a boardroom arguing about Project Resonance. General Markoff got tired of going to these things months ago, so naturally you volunteered to represent him there.

You've always been ambitious, and the most surefire way to get ahead in the military is to attach yourself to a promising pair of coattails and not let go. If your mentor succeeds, then the rising tide will lift your boat. If they fail, it's easy enough for you to escape the fallout. But it never came to that, because you're careful, and you chose well.

General Markoff and you are two peas in a pod. The General sees your ambition and understands it, and tries to reward you accordingly. Sure, you get a lot of the crap assigned to you, naturally - but Markoff also sees that you're well-compensated for your efforts. In exchange, you are a reliable and loyal attache.

When you heard about Resonance, you could see that it was going to be big. Fundamental research into genetic non-lethal weaponry - and very promising initial results. Markoff would do very well to become associated with this. When you suggested it, the General immediately agreed. The project was going about as well as could be expected, as far as you can remember...

But ... your memory has some gaps in it, you're certain. And you're in a bunker. What's going on?

General Markoff is your boss. Markoff gives you a hand up, and, in return you keep things under control and point Markoff in the right direction.

General Rosen was assigned by Markoff to non-lethal weapons and has always resented it. This often means that resentment gets taken out on you, but that doesn't matter much, there's nothing Rosen can do.

Dr. Hefetz is in charge of the Wright-Patterson research laboratory where much of the Resonance work has taken place. You have been coaxing Markoff to pull Resonance more under the army's influence.

Dr. White is important. There is something you need to remember about Dr. White. Something very important.
